THE FLEMINGS OF COOLICK

In the parish register of births (Kilcummin parish) there is recorded that many different families of Flemings lived in the townland of Coolick. It is very probable that those families were related to one another but it cannot now be ascertained with any degree of correctness how near such relation was. One thing is certain viz., that all of them held portions of land of varying extent in this townland. Many of them occupied portions of the mountain part of the farm held under lease dated 1811 by a John P. Fleming. Other families besides Flemings lived in this mountain farm for we find that at the present day some of its fields bear names associated with families of Barry, Fernane, Moriarty and Kerrisk. All those were what was called at the time subtenants and from time to time were transferred to better farms than to be obtained under middlemen or small landlords who held large tracts under the descendants of Undertakers to whom such were granted after the Elizabethan and Williamite wars. There are many now living who say that all the Fleming families of Coolick were descended from a common ancestor but this cannot be vouched for at least from traditional sources and indeed it does not much matter now. According to a tradition of a family or families of Flemings were brought to Coolick by a captain Browne in the seventeenth century. This Captain Browne was a member of the Browne family from whom the present Earl of Kenmare is descended. He was known locally as Lord Dunrine, but there is nothing in our historical records to warrant his right to such a title. It is recorded in Smith's History of Kerry that a Captain Browne lived in a castle in the townland of Ardagh, Kilcummin. The remains of this castle are still to be seen and there is no doubt but that parts of it were used in building some farmhouses in the district round about. This castle at Ardagh was the residence first built by the Borwne family who afterwards went to Molahiffe after having acquired through mortgage from the last MacCarthy More a very large part of East Kerry, and which afterwards came to be known as The Kenmare Estate. The struggle between the descendants of this MacCarthy More and the Brownes for this territory, afterwards, was indeed a very interesting one and it is detailed in many of our Kerry histories. The middlemen and tenants of the Brownes were raided without mercy by the followers of Daniel MacCarthy - the Robin Hood of Munster as he was styled, and Captain Browne was forced to select strong positions here and there in that part of the Kenmare Estate under his charge. To such strongholds he brought numbers of fighting men to meet the onslaughts of Daniel MacCarthy's men. Coolick was one of these positions. Here the Captain built a house near a strong fort or Lios which over 100 years ago was a notable landmark in the neighbourhood. This fort owing to a high and steep earthen ditch or fence which surrounded it was eminently suited for defence and it must have been selected by the Captain as a place to keep watch for the marauders who constantly harassed him and his people. It is thought now that he brought here a number of families to whom he gave portions of land in the Coolick townland. In the course of time the Captain gave this house to a family named Fleming whose descendants will be dealt with in this genealogical effort. With this house he also gave a farm of over 200 acres to this Fleming family. One half of this f. was mountain, land portion of which was sublet by the Flemings to a number of tenants who reclaimed much of it from time to time. The first member or head of this family of which there is now an account was a Patrick Fleming, who had a son named John to succeed him as owner of both farms. There were other children also but nothing is known of them save that one of them, a man, became an engineer who was drowned in the St. Lawrence River in Canada while surveying for the English in this then but little-known land. A daughter of his was m. to John Healy of clasnagarrane whose descendants have been dealt with already. In 1811 John Fleming got a lease of both farms on the lives of his son, Pat, a Father O'Riordan and another. This lease, by the way, did not expire till 1890 on the death of Fr. O'Riordan who lived to a very advanced age.

She had a crop of oats in her field when she was evicted and it is said that it was a very fine crop indeed. As she was leaving she uttered the following wish: "that there may never again be such a crop in my field." For upwards of 60 years this field was not tilled but once, over twelve years ago. On that year there was a crop of potatoes, oats and turnips grown in it and the yield was so poor that it was not tilled since. Local opinion has it that this was the result of what the people of the place call "Jude's Curse". The field has not been tilled since.)
